What would you do if both parents were diagnosed with Alzheimer's? At the time of their diagnosis, Ed Church struggles to his feet, yelling, "How dare you use the A. word with me," while Ibbby wags her finger at the doctor scolding, "Shame on you." They protect each other, Ibbby by asserting, "We're not leaving our home," and Ed reassuring, "We're just fine." About his driving Ed defends, "I'm an excellent driver, I've never had an accident." When their daughter, Rosie, finds dings in Ed's car, he dismisses, "Someone must have bumped into me." After Rosie moves them to assisted living, convinced they are on a second honeymoon, they break the news, "We've decided not to have more children." In the late stages, they politely shake Rosie's hand, inquiring, "Now, who are you?" In ALZHEIMER'S DAUGHTER readers journey with Rosie Church from her first suspicions that something is awry to nearly a decade later as she is honored to hold Ed and Ibbby's hands when they draw their final breaths.
